Excerpt: .in the hands of the kutchner, and recommended them to his special protection. Now this kutchner was the very impersonation of the old, slow, phlegmatic, inexorable Saxon postboy--a wight of few words-- who took my baggage, counted the parcels, pointed with one thumb to the darkening skies, then with his head to the inside of his vehicle, and seeing I did not take the hint, shrugged his shoulders contemptuously, climbed leisurely into his seat, rolled the cigar back into the centre of his mouth, from the corner into which it had been pushed by the usual organ of speech, cracked his whip, which neither had, nor was meant to have, the smallest effect upon his team, and departed. I descended the hill also, a little out of humour with Providence for making me fidgety about the storm, when I wished to enjoy a walk and a soothing view at my ease; I marked how the passengers going before me missed the path, which I felt sure, though it seemed to be roundabout, was the real pleasant way to the little town, and then fell to thinking onwards to my journey the next day. These thoughts took a rule of three shape, doubtless suggested by the sight of the individual I have just described, and I said to myself, If the difference between the speed of an English and a Saxon railway is so much, what accumulation of Saxon postboys will make one English locomotive? I...
