Excerpt from The Incidental Effects of Drugs: A Pharmacological and Clinical Hand-Book. Writers have always hesitated to regard these incidental effects as toxicological, and with justice, for we are not warranted in pronouncing one or more symptoms, which do not appear in a thousand cases after taking a drug, to be the result of poisoning when they show themselves in the next case. It is further to be remembered that the majority of these incidental effects in no wise correspond to the symptoms produced by a poisonous dose of the same drug, and that we cannot produce them at will, especially those affecting the skin. These appear only under definite individual conditions, and are, therefore, almost beyond the reach of experimental provocation. Up to the present time, there has been no lack of physicians thoroughly imbued with humoral-pathological ideas, who, in given cases, attribute a certain teleological significance to the appearance of incidental drug effects, such as was formerly claimed, e. G., for hemorrhage from the hemorrhoidal vessels. In the same manner as it was then regarded as a fortunate circumstance that...
