PRACTICAL DIRECTIONS FOR BREWING. Before we proceed, we must define properly the object we have in view. Let it then be considered that strength in beer, or the increase of its quantity of alcohol, is a very remote consideration, and that its excellence ought to, and does, depend on its nutritive qualities, above those of every other common beverage. To secure these it is absolutely necessary that the fermentation be checked at the earliest period at which it becomes sufficiently palatable for drinking; for the extract of malt or corn, which enters into the composition of beer, is, as it were, the very essence of nutriment, and consists of a certain quantity of saccharine matter, united to a large portion of a fine mucilage and fecula, and it is this which is so essential to the production of a good malt liquor. During the course of the fermentation, the wort, as already stated, is constantly undergoing a reduction in weight, so that when arrived at its extreme length, (as in the distillery) the same wort, which was at first considerably heavier than water, will, at the conclusion of the process, be about the same weight, or very little more; the consequence is, that the sugar being first attacked, all the nutritious part of the wort, is at length decomposed, and in its place remains little else than ardent spirit--thus, in proportion as we approach the extreme of fermentation, is malt liquor deteriorated, and the operation cannot...
