Text mining uncovers the underlying themes or concepts that are contained in large document collections. Text mining applications have two phases: exploring the textual data for its content and then using discovered information to improve the existing processes. Both are important and can be referred to as descriptive mining and predictive mining. Descriptive mining involves discovering the themes and concepts that exist in a textual collection. For example, many companies collect customers comments from sources that include the Web, e-mail, and contact centers. Mining the textual comments includes providing detailed information about the terms, phrases, and other entities in the textual collection; clustering the documents into meaningful groups; and reporting the concepts that are discovered in the clusters. Results from descriptive mining enable you to better understand the textual collection. Predictive mining involves classifying the documents into categories and using the information that is implicit in the text for decision making. For example, you might want to identify the customers who ask standard questions so that they receive an automated answer. In addition, you might want to predict whether a customer is likely to buy again, or even if you should spend more effort to keep the customer. Predictive modeling involves examining past data to predict results. Consider that you have a customer data set that contains information about past buying behaviors, along with customer comments. You could build a predictive model that can be used to score new customers-that is, to analyze new customers based on the data from past customers. For example, if you are a researcher for a pharmaceutical company, you know that hand-coding adverse reactions from doctors reports in a clinical study is a laborious,...
