Excerpt from Radium, Vol. 4: A Monthly Journal Devoted to the Chemistry, Physics, and Therapeutics of Radium and Radio-Active Substances; November, 1914 With regard to the use of radioactive substances in the treatment of cancer, Dr. Levin says: The rationale of the radiotherapy in malignant tumors must be looked for in the so-called selective action of the rays on the cancer cell. The Roentgen rays and the rays of the radioactive substances are absorbed by the cells of the radiated tissue. Through the biochemical action of the rays the cells become diseased. The injury caused in the cells by the radiations may differ in degree in accordance with the quantity of the rays absorbed. Cells only slightly injured may recover while a severer injury may completely destroy the cell. Every cell of the animal or plant organism is susceptible to injurious action of the radiations. But the susceptibility varies in degree with the cells of different tissues. The cells of malignant tumors are a great deal more susceptible to the action of the rays than the cells of the normal tissues surrounding the tumor. If the rays are employed of a correct quality and in a sufficient quantity, it is possible to destroy all the cancer cells in a certain locality and at the same time leave the normal tissues either intact or so slightly injured, that they ultimately recover. This quantitatively selective influence of the rays may reach to a depth of at least three and one-half cm. Technique of Radium Therapy. The alpha and beta rays which constitute the greater part of the radiation are called soft rays and have little power of penetration. They are absorbed completely...
