Excerpt from Tacoma: The City With a Snow-Capped Mountain in Its Dooryard The picture that forms the front cover embellishment of this book shows the other half of the city to good advantage, although part of the area above pictured is also pictured on the cover. First impressions of Tacoma, on approaching by water or by rail from the East, are striking, and grow in favor with closer acquaintance. Skyscraper rearing above skyscraper and business block rearing above business block; church spires vicing with church spires for honors as to highest point achieved; deciduous trees giving verdant green touch to all; below the waters of Sound and Bay; above, a serrated skyline against the western sky - these catch the eye and the heart of the visitor approaching for the first time, and love at first sight is invariably the rule. Tacoma s corporate limits take in something over sixty-five square miles of territory, the greater portion of which is well built up. The fascination attaching...
