Excerpt from The American Practitioner, 1874, Vol. 10: A Monthly Journal of Medicine and Surgery But of those going about our streets there are multitudes who do not rise to this average; dyspeptics, hypochondriacs, rheumatics, subjects of headache, of neuralgia, of catarrh, or of some one Of the minor complaints to which the body is subject; or they are wayward, impulsive, odd, whimsical, eccentric people, of whom we are inclined to say they are a little cracked, or their brains are addled, or they are crazy, or their minds are badly balanced. The world is full of such individuals. We meet them wherever we go. At the same time we should not affirm of such that they labor under any disease of the mind. We Should not call them lunatics, certainly. No one would hesitate about their moral responsibility or their competency to manage their estates; much less would any one have them sent to a mad house.
