The modifications of sound in the Art of Music are resolved, mainly, into two di visions viz: First - the modification of sound with regard to the degree of frequency of the vibrations or pulsations of the air, which produces what is called pitch z - and, Second - the modification of sound with regard to duration and succession, which is called time. The former makes Melody; and the latter Rhythm; both of which, even in the simplest music - or that of a single part - are generally combined.* Music, in its greatest perfection, consists of several parts together; which combi nation is called harmony. The analysis of music, therefore, reduces it to three dis tinct properties - melody, rhythm, and harmony. As these instructions are designed, not to teach the composition of music, but sim ply how to read or perform that which is composed and written it becomes necesse ry to consider only the two modifications of sound - Pitch and Time - with reference to their use in the production of Melody and Rhythm. The best representation Of the modifications of Pitch belonging to the musical sys tem, as now established, is found in the instrument called the Piano Forte. The picture of the Key-board of that instrument is given at Table no. 1. About the Publisher Forgotten...
