Not illustrated. 1862 Excerpt: .part of the question, we are told that Lusk is self-supporting; that the value of labour executed by the convicts and the warders who work with them, pays both for maintenance and establishment-charges. As to how far that is really the case we give no opinion, because, the labour being still chiefly employed in reclaiming waste land, its value cannot be put to that test of the public market on which alone we can rely, as we mentioned before, in speaking of labour at Portland (p. 18). But, whether or not the labour of the prisoners repay their cost, it is difficult to conceive any arrangement by which that cost could be made less, --that any prison could be cheaper, in construction or management, than such an one as that at Lusk. The warders are men by no means above the ordinary stamp. The resident head of the establishment was a warder under the old system, which he had to unlearn. Such a staff must no doubt require frequent and vigilant supervision by the Directors; but, making any reasonable allowance for additional cost of direction, we have no doubt that such establishments may be made cheap, as facts have demonstrated that they may be made efficient, as parts of a well-arranged and well-managed system of prison discipline. The other Intermediate Prison, which we visited, at Smithfield, shows how the same principles may be applied under very different circumstances. Smithfield is an old and ill-constructed 54 MORAL,...
