Excerpt from The Gulstonian Lectures on Secondary Degenerations of the Spinal Cord: Delivered at the Royal College of Physicians, March, 1889 R. President and Gentlemen, - It was with feelings almost apologetic that I announced the subject of these lectures. I felt that it might be expected that a subject of wider clinical interest should be chosen. But on referring to the terms of the bequest of the founder of this lectureship, I discovered that he had anticipated my difficulty. He was evidently aware that the younger Fellows would be more able to do useful work in the realm of pathology than in clinical medicine. He provides that the lecturer shall give what is more of a demonstration than a lecture on the dead body (if such be procurable!). Two hundred and fifty years and more have elapsed since his death, and yet the wisdom of the method implied in the wording of his bequest becomes, not less, but more apparent. If our art is to be raised from the level of mere empiricism, it must be grounded on the sure basis of pathology. In ordinary pathological inquiries it is usual to study the normal, and to reason from it concerning the abnormal. This method is followed in my first lecture, on the Histology of Secondary Degeneration. But when we wish to study the course of the fibres in the cord we reverse the usual process, and make use of pathology to teach us anatomy. It is not too much to say that Without this method our knowledge of the anatomy of the cord would be of the vaguest and most rudimentary description.
