BOOK SUMMARY Sitaad is a genre of religious panegyrics laced with spirituality and a yearning to emulate and fuse with some respected earlier women of Islam - most notably Fatima (the daughter of Prophet Muhammad - Peace and blessings be upon him) and others who lived before the coming of Islam such as Xaawa (Eve). The term Xaawaleey which can be translated as the party of Eve alludes to that common bond and shared identify among women which transcends time, space and belief. Other than its spiritual significance, it is a medium where some women turn up to temper any negative feelings giving them trouble, and eventually it assists them reconcile with the reality of world they live in. When the incanting, often accompanied by clapping and drumming, reaches its climax, some even pass into ecstasy and spiritual intoxication (jibbo), in which they later emerge strong out of the session, relieved, full of optimism and energy to face the challenges of their immediate future. For children, it is a festive occasion and for wayfarers, a place where they can quench their thirst and satiate their hunger. Moreover, in contrast to the local contemporary women institutions working in women empowerment programs whose actions are often looked at by most men with suspicion, women of Sitaad never use it as a forum to conspire against men or challenge their hegemony. Instead, they use such occasions in consoling those among them who suffered bereavement or experienced misfortune, help their sick and poor, and enjoin the good and advice themselves against evil doing. An ideal character every women of Sitaad wants to be identified with is Raalliyo (the Good Woman) which is synonymous...
