Physicians are very apt to look with distrust upon an innovation either in theory or practice, and it is well that they are so in the main. But I do think as a class they are less apt to believe truth when they know it to be such, or less willing to join hearts and hands in an earnest endeavor to find the only true basis upon which the practice of their science can be predicated, than are other men. Most men by nature are conservative, and an education in what direction soever, is likely to leave an impression for life. Hence the difficulty in true progress. But considering the fact that physicians who are competent to carry on systematic experiments and take intelligent observations thereon, are generally the most liberal, I do the more cheerfully undertake the task of pressing the claim of a new theory. I refer to the one set forth by Dr. R. About the Publisher Forgotten Books publishes hundreds of thousands of rare...
