BiblioGov. Paperback. Book Condition: New. This item is printed on demand. Paperback. 52 pages. Dimensions: 9.7in. x 7.4in. x 0.1in. Pursuant to a congressional request, GAO surveyed public school districts implementation of the Centers for Disease Controls (CDC) educational program about human immunodeficiency virus (HIV), which causes acquired immunodeficiency syndrome. GAO found that: (1) although CDC believed that students at every grade level should receive age-appropriate HIV education, only 5 percent of the school districts required education at each grade level; (2) school districts most frequently provided instruction for the seventh through tenth grades and the least instruction for the eleventh and twelfth grades; (3) school districts cited already crowded curricula as a restriction on the extent of HIV education they offered; (4) districts that did not require any HIV education typically enrolled fewer than 450 students; (5) state and local education agencies lack of adequate data regarding students HIV-related knowledge, beliefs, and behaviors hampered efforts to set program priorities, evaluate programs, and improve operations; (6) state and local agencies attributed their inability to collect CDC-suggested data to lack of staff or authority to ask sensitive questions; (7) about 20 percent of HIV teachers received no specialized training on the subject,...
