Excerpt from The Wolf-Cub: A Novel of Spain There are no deer in the Sierra Nevada - neither red, fallow, nor roe. There are no wild boar. There is only the Spanish ibex. And what poor serrano can provision his good wife and his cabana full of lusty brats by hunting the Spanish ibex? He has but one weapon - the ancient muzzle-loading smooth-bore. And the ibex speeds like a chill glacial Wind across the snow fields and craggy solitudes, and only a man armed with a cordite repeater can hope to bring him down. Soon descended the mountains only men who had turned their backs upon Minas de la Sierra and who thought to leave behind forever the bleak peaks and the wind-swept gorges and the implacable hunger. Out of every ten only one crawled back, beaten and bruised by the savage Spanish cities and the savage Spanish plains. With those of Minas de la Sierra who could not tear themselves away from their native rocks, these broken-hearted ones continued on and with them slowly starved.
