Excerpt: .sheath, and the box for the quadrans, or piece of money which was paid by each visitor. It is probable that the sword belonged to the balneator or keeper of the Thermae. The door (o) which opens on the street where the temple of Fortune is situated, leads also into the same vestibule. By means of a corridor, we proceed through the passage (2) into the apodyterium, or undressing-room (6), which is also accessible by the corridor (a) from the street now called the Street of the Arch. In this corridor alone were found upwards of five hundred lamps, and upwards of a thousand were discovered in various parts pf the baths during the excavations, Of these the best were selected, and the workmen were ordered to destroy the remainder. The greater number were of terra-cotta, some had an impression of the graces on them, and others the figure of Harpocrates, --both of inferior execution. The ceiling of this passage is decorated with stars. The apodyterium has three seats, marked (6, d) in the preceding and the following section, made of lava, with a step to place the feet on. Holes (a) still remain in the wall, in which pegs were fixed, for the bathers to hang up their clothes. This chamber is stuccoed from the cornice to the ground; it is highly finished, and coloured yellow. The cornice is of large dimensions, and has something of an Egyptian character; below it is carved...
