O, wondrous maid! Let him beware Who calls thee witch, and e en declare Himself thy judge on bended knees Before that throne no mortal sees. Proud France, whose annals glory bore, By factions torn, was France no more. Her sunny, vine-clad, fruitful lands Had fallen into English hands; Her subjects stood, from hour to hour, In mortal fear of England s power; Her feeble king was king in name; Her fearless nobles lived in shame; Her wretched peasants, doomed to feel The base, aristocratic heel, Down-trodden, plunged, they knew not where, Into the depths of deep despair. And here, as Hell s tormenting darts Transfixed their fainting, bleeding hearts, They cried with each distressing breath For mercy from the god of Death.
