Paperback. Condition: New. 331 pages. Using Fischer Industries, a highly-admired fictional Honda automotive parts manufacturing giant based in Columbus, Ohio, as the analogy for the United States of America, Fischer Patriotic allows readers from all political persuasions and all walks of life to take a second look at the often controversial world of American politics during the first decade of the twenty-first century, against the backdrop of recent events and American history, in an entraining neutral manner, allowing one to step back, take a breath, and look at American political life at arms-length through the lens of a workplace setting, instead. Readers are invited to look at events such as September 11th, the wars in Afghanistan and Iraq, the financial crisis of Fall 2008, the 2008 Presidential Election, and the role of unions and community organizing groups through the lens of American and Japanese business sensibilities as well as from the vantage point of the personal worldviews held by the real life politicians and decision makers who influenced these times and events, allegorically inside the walls of Fischer Industries, while acknowledging their real world counterparts in both persona and occurrence outside the confines of this story, taking care to separate in a respectful manner the allegorical characters and events from the real world counterparts they are meant to portray, especially in terms of September 11th. Fischer Patriotic not only invites readers to take a second look at the events and policy makers comprising the American political landscape through their own eyes, but invites one to do so through the eyes of the characters in the story too ranging from the youthful, intelligent, and attractive 20 something Jillian Neal to the middle aged, professional family man Fred Hutchinson, as the characters in the story watch events affecting Fischer Industries and themselves...
