Brand New Book  Print on Demand .Excerpt from Louisiana Conservationist, Vol. 29: January-February, 1977 Fortunately, to offset the detrimental effects, the Catahoula Lake Diversion Channel was dug and a control structure was incorporated into it that allowed lake level regulation. The Corps of Engineers, us. Fish and Wildlife Service, and the Louisiana Wildlife and Fisheries Commission formulated the water-level management plan. For a few years, the man-made plumbing system created its share of problems. But it appears that now most of the inherent flaws have been worked out, and within the framework of the agreement between controlling agencies a near optimum management program is possible. But when habitat so excellent as Catahoula Lake is still found to exist, the tendency is to make it perfect, make it ideal. The only obstacle preventing perfection and idealism on Catahoula was the encroachment of water elm and swamp privet across the lake bed. After a survey biologists determined that the two invading (and unwanted) plants occupied approximately acres around the perimeter. Translated simply, water elm and swamp privet reduced hunting area on Catahoula and they grew so hardily and formed such a tight canopy they destroyed duck plant-food production beneath them.
