Ophiodon Elongatus Girard; II. Oncorhynchus Keta Walbaum; III. The Diagnosis of Fish by Means of the Scales; IV. Mallotus Villosus Muller Apparently there is not the same trouble here in locating herring spawn as there is in the North Sea. In fact there is no trouble at all. The spring tide rise is up to 16 feet or more. At or near high tide a school of herring passes into a Bay or into shallow water along the shore and there the females move in and out among the seaweed or eel grass. Depositing the eggs as they rub against these solid objects. There the eggs adhere not only to the seaweed but to some extent to one another. In the meantime the males extrude the milt in such abundance that when it mixes with the water, the water becomes almost perfectly Opaque, of a light greenish-white color. Before the tide goes down the eggs are practically all fertilised and at low tide - sometimes even at half-tide - are exposed in such large quantities that no one going near could fail to see them. The ripple caused by the fish in the water, although this may be seen at any time when a school of herring is passing - the peculiar opacity of the water, the flocks of gulls that follow the progress of the school, the masses of eggs exposed later, inconceivably numerous, with hordes of ducks doing their best to reduce the number, each and all give unmistakeable evidence as to the locality where spawning takes place. Although the eggs are out of the water for four or...
