GAO discussed the Department of Defense's (DOD) acquisition reorganization in response to the Defense Reorganization Act of 1986, including: (1) how DOD approached reorganization; (2) changes in the civilian-military balance within DOD acquisition organizations; and (3) the roles of military staff in the acquisition process. GAO found that: (1) the Army extensively restructured, integrated its two existing staffs, and eliminated about 190 headquarters positions; (2) prior to the act, the Navy instituted changes to decentralize its acquisition management, restructure systems commands, and reduce its program documentation requirements; (3) the Air Force combined the existing military and secretariat offices but limited staff integration; (4) the percentage of civilian personnel was significantly smaller in the Air Force than the other services; (5) civilians accounted for 46 percent of the Army technical and managerial acquisition staff, 44 percent of the Navy staff, and only 26 percent of the Air Force staff; (6) although the Army had a balanced mix of military and civilian personnel in key supervisory positions, the Air Force generally had military officers holding the same supervisory positions; (7) the Navy had not completed the transfer of acquisition personnel; and (8) although the Air Force Chief of Staff continued an active role in the acquisition process, the Army Chiefs involvement was significantly reduced. This item ships from La Vergne, TN. Paperback.
