This not only prevents infection among school children and the consequent carrying disease from one home to others, and also prevents the progressive development in the individual child of dental decay, bad eyesight, hearing or other disabilities, but it also affords a means of educating the child and through the child its parents, in some of the elementary facts of hygiene. The matters which have been mentioned all relate to the prevention of infection. Hygienic progress during the last few decades has consisted almost exclusively in the prevention of infection. This is a natural and proper result of the discovery of the germ character of many diseases. They constitute for the most part the acute diseases - typhoid, smallpox, scarlet fever, etc. But there is another class of diseases equally important - most diseases of the kidney, liver, stomach, heart, blood vessels and nerves. These may be called the chronic diseases, the control of which depends on the personal habits of the individual....
