But, tired and weary as she was, sleep was denied her at Warrington, for during the night there were continual alarms, which it was pretended came from Chester, but were really only concerted to keep the troops on the alert, for both the besiegers and the besieged at Chester had enough on their hands. (Life of Mrs. Thornton, Surtees Soc., 347.) On the 18th January, 1644, Colonel Sir Thomas Aston attempted to relieve Nantwich, which was besieged; but he had too lately buckled on his armour to know how much caution it was necessary for a commander to observe in war, and, instead of success, he met with a disheartening repulse. (Hist. Ches., I., 36.) On the 26th of the same month, when an attempt was again made by General Lord Byron and Sir Thomas Aston (who was serving under him) to relieve Nantwich, the attempt was not only again unsuccessful, but Sir Thomas Aston was made prisoner, along with Colonel George Monk (afterwards Duke of Albemarle) and the celebrated divine, Thomas Fuller. (Hume s Hist. of England, 308.) General Lord Byron, writing to Prince Rupert from Chester on the 7th April, 1644, amongst other military news writes to his highness as follows: -- Yesterday I sent my own regiment of foot to Frodsham with an intention to have kept that bridge, but the enemye appeared there so strong that after a little skirmish, wherein some men were lost on both...
