Her first attempt at happily ever after did not end quite that way. Having survived that experience, Julia is content with her current circumstance. A single mom, she's focused on getting her daughter through college, keeping a roof over her head, and trying to stay ahead of the bills. She is not looking for complications, crisis, or catastrophe. The word man in her experience is synonymous with those words. So why did she agree to a blind date? She has no clue. Sitting in a restaurant, waiting for a man she does not really want to see but who she agreed to meet to get her well-meaning friend off her back, she makes a snap decision to get out of Dodge before the guy actually shows. He was late anyway. But before she translated thought to task, he showed up. No not the date, but somebody definitely more delicious. One look and she's tempted to court catastrophe one more time. When he unearths the reason for her reluctance...
