A contemporary and pupil of Augustine of Hippo (354-430 A.D.), Orosius exerted significant influence not only during his lifetime (e.g. as a speaker against the Priscillianists or the Pelagians on various synods) but, through his work, considerably contributed to later developments in the fields of historiography as well as geography. Although Orosius writings have been accused of simplicity compared to the much more elaborate De civitate dei or even showing signs of haste , he together with Augustine fundamentally shaped the Christian perspective on history in late antiquity and, even more so, in the early middle ages. His works were widely distributed and used in the early medieval period and gained enormous popularity, so that even today about 200 manuscript-copies of them are still extant . The alleged influence Orosius exerted on Christianity in the centuries to follow and during his lifetime as well as his quite radical position on a divine Roman-Christian claim to leadership (which I will examine in detail) could probably qualify him for the term 'Christian Propagandist', as suggested in the title. Thus, in this essay, I will focus on the question whether Orosius can be described as a 'Christian propagandist' in the modern sense. To answer this question properly, it will at first be necessary to define my notion of propaganda, since the...
