In response to a congressional request, GAO evaluated the Federal Aviation Administration s (FAA) Civil Aviation Security Program to determine the effectiveness of FAA inspection efforts to identify and rectify domestic security deficiencies. GAO reviewed inspection programs at six large airports and found that: (1) FAA lacked adequate controls over personnel identification systems and air operations access points; (2) inspectors did not verify personnel and vehicle identification systems, but relied on airport or air carrier officials descriptions and judgments; and (3) passenger-screening processes needed improvement to ensure their effectiveness in preventing passengers from carrying weapons on board airplanes. GAO also found that FAA: (1) has addressed several systemic security problems at major airports; (2) required airport operators to install computer-controlled identification systems for access to restricted areas; and (3) increased the penalties on carriers for screening system failures.
