When I laid down my pen a month ago, I thought I had finished my book, and said good-bye to my readers. Since then, however, I have had so many questions put to me by people interested in emigration and anxious to obtain information about America, and the life and prospects of young colonists in our share of that country, that I am tempted to take up my pen again and say a word or two more for the benefit of those who either have already sent sons or capital to that country, or are thinking of doing so now. Unless a man insists on going about the world with his eyes shut, he must nowadays be struck with the number of young fellows of good family and education who are annually leaving our country to seek a competence elsewhere. You can hardly find a family in Great Britain to-day that has not got at least one member at work in one or other of our colonies. It is not only that competitive examinations have closed so many careers to all except those whose strength is in their heads, and who have a natural aptitude for cramming; not only that the lower classes--thanks to their-advanced education--are beginning to give up handicrafts and crowd clerkdom with sons who prefer the shabby gentility of a city clerk to the hearty, independence of the skilled labouring man, and so hustle the poor gentleman off his...
