It has been found very easy to put in the plain concrete curb, and it has proved very durable and at the same time has added much to the appearance of the street. Another problem that the road engineers have had to solve is the building of a gutter that will be smooth enough not to retard the flow of storm water upon very flat grades and at the same time so impervious, durable and tough that it will not rot out under continued dampness nor wear out quickly under usage. Cobblestone, brick and stone block retard the flow of water. Asphalt and coal tar rot or disintegrate under the action of water. Concrete once more fulfills all the requirements. By combining the curb and gutter into one monolithic whole, several difficulties are avoided. The displacement of the curb, due to frost upon one side or the expansion of the street upon the other, is greatly reduced. Shrinkage and expansion do not cause cracks along the face of the curb, thus allowing storm water to seep into the foundation and road-bed to create havoc. Debris, which usually collects in the gutters, is more easily carried along by the storm water, hence a cleaner looking street is the result. The general appearance of a combined curb and gutter is more pleasing to the eye. So once more concrete has found an opportunity to usurp the place of other building material. Figure 62 shows a section,...
