Excerpt from The Speaker, Vol. 4: September 19, 1891 Having definitely decided not to annex Manipur, the Government of India has done what is very nearly the same thing. A collateral relative of the ex - Maharajah, of the mature age of five, has been selected for the throne, and a British Resident will administer the country during his minority. How the young Rajah, chura chand, will profit by the unique opportunities for political education promised him by the Times is an interesting problem: still more so, how the country, after sixteen years of skilled English administration, will be able to return to the more primitive methods of a native State. But the arrangement is, at any rate, a partial concession to the principle that India is to be ruled through native potentates, which is one of the benefits we owe to the scientific spirit in sociology.
