Excerpt from Two Discourses on the Moral State of Man: Delivered in the Central Church, Charleston, April 13 and 20, 1851 Heie it is that our moral judgment is itself perverted. Conscience, which draws the line, to our perceptions, between good and evil, is here itself at fault. It feels. A bias from the very depravity which it is summoned to recognize and measure. Though we may not be able to disguise to ourselves the fact, that we are chargeable with neglect of God and wilful violation of his commands, we still do not feel the compunction which such a fact would awaken, if our moral sensibilities were in a healthful state. The holy prophet calls heaven and earth to wonder at this unnatural revolt and apostacy. But we, instead of abhorring ourselves and repenting in dust and ashes, are ready to palliate and excuse our forgetfulness of God, our ih gratitude toward him, our transgressions of his law.
