Excerpt from Experimentation on Living Animals: Hearing Before the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, United States Senate, First Session on S. 3737; A Bill Providing for an Investigation Into the Extent and Conditions of the Practice of Experimentation on Living Animals, June 19, 1916 Dr. Benedict. I feel personally that a painful experiment is in most cases a foolish experiment, that the introduction of the element of pain would vitiate the physiological results in most of the matters which would ultimately come up as practical issues in medicine. Of course, that would not apply to experimentation simply with regard to sensation or the detection of pain but with regard to visceral action in general the introduction of the element of pain would in most cases vitiate the value of the experiment. The chairman. You mean they conduct these experiments now without using the known methods of preventing pain? Dr. Benedict. No, sir; I do not mean to imply that at all. I feel personally this way: In the first place, I believe we should have the truth, whatever it is. I would say that about anything, this or anything else, whichever side I take in the matter. I feel that a thorough investigation will show the humane societies and the people generally and the legislatures throughout the country that for the most part in all institutions of a creditable nature every precaution is taken to avoid pain and that very few of the experiments actually are painful. Only a small minority necessitate pain, and the allegations of cruelty are almost all with regard to what would be violations of the spirit of any reasonable legislation. That is, they involve clumsiness, experimentation even by...
