This I do with pleasure, although somewhat at a loss for anything to say; both because so much might be said, and because it is not really necessary to say anything. Good wine needs no bush, and our authors work is distinctly good wine and commends itself without any adventitious recommendation. In describing the actualities of working-class life in Paris Mr. Steele has done a real service to the people of this country, and one for which everyone of the readers of this little book will, I am sure, be grateful. Much has been done in recent years to bring about a better understanding between the English and the French nations, to establish a real entente cordiale and to eradicate from the minds of Englishmen that hatred of their neighbours across the Channel which at one time was inculcated as almost an article of national religion. Considerable progress has been made in this direction, and there is no doubt that the French are held in greater love and esteem by the people of this country at the present time than ever before. We are on the best of terms with our Gallic neighbours, but we do not know them as well as we should do. About the PublisherForgotten Books publishes hundreds of thousands of rare and classic books.
