About The Book Smoke Considered simply as stories, Fathers and Sons and Smoke are to all intents and purposes independent of each other, yet in important particulars the latter is a sequel to the first. Once on his arrival at St. Petersburg, Turgenev was met with the words, Just see what your Nihilists are doing! They have almost gone so far as to burn the city. Thus again he took up the question of social reform, and in Smoke (Dim) he views with apprehension the actions of the so-called intellectuals, who would make themselves responsible for the shaping of future Russia. Charlatans among the leaders of the new thought, and society dilettantism, both came under his merciless lash. In his opinion the men and ideas in the two camps are no more than smoke--dirty, evil-smelling smoke. The entire atmosphere is gloomy, and throughout is only relieved by the character of Irina, the most exquisite piece of feminine psychology in the whole range of Turgenev's novels.
