Excerpt from Academic Freedom If there be any justification for this view it cannot but do harm to University life. For while the politician has to have his ear to the ground and to have an intuition for the cross currents in public life, it is the business of the University teacher to stimulate thought and set forth. As a pioneer, the new point of view. In the days of my boyhood, I remember very well the docks in Glasgow crowded with great sailing ships, moored in tiers, with their figureheads breasting the bollards of the wharf and their long jib-booms thrusting out far over the freight sheds. The scents of the cargo are with me still, as coffee, and spices. And rare woods from the East Indies, were discharged. For these great vessels with their towering spars, preparing to go forth on a fresh voyage, were, each of them. A fresh kindling of fancy as one thought of the many backwaters of the world's commerce in which they might be about to seek a fresh cargo. I...
