The Los Angeles Review, Volume 13 (Paperback)

By -

Red Hen Press, United States, 2013. Paperback. Condition: New. Language: English . Brand New Book. We begin in California in this issue of The Los Angeles Review with Dana Gioia's California Hills in August, which ends, the empty sky, the wish for water, which sums up Southern California in August, all of us hot and waiting, watching the sky for nothing. Gioia captures the speed, the distance, the car, the open air. I'm always enthralled with how many stories and poems of the West include cars, driving, speed, the turnpikes of morning, the thick smog air, gas stations, and the punch of late night driving in your gut when you decide to make the long miles. Joe Strummer is dead. I know this because I heard it on the radio in the van on my way here, Dani Burlison writes in Joe Strummer is Dead. We hear good and bad news in cars. We live in cars. Our lives happen in cars and sometimes stop happening in cars. It was the pistol that got me into his car, Chelsia A. Rice writes in Tough Enough to Float, and the story unravels, of a young girl raped in a car...
