These crystals are very extraordinary, as they comprehend the Octaedron with truncated edges: they have also truncated and bevelled solid angles, making a very compound crystal: see the left hand figure. The intermediate varieties are the dodecacdron and octaedron, truncated at the solid angles. The VOL. II. I particles show some signs of being thread-like confused octaedrons, somewhat resembling those on the following plate, tab. 147-They are externally between a copper colour and red, scarcely metallic in the lustre, until cut, and then perfectly so. It is, as the Count de Bournon observes, useful in many instances to use a magnifier to examine crystals; and we should lose some very interesting beauties without it. These indeed may be pretty well seen by the eye alone, but it is admirable to observe how neatly these are formed by such help as the magnifying glass. We do not know of any other specimen of this kind. TAB. CXLVII. CUPRUM oxygenizatum. Filamentose Oxide of Copper, Div. 2. Imitative. Nature, ever various and instructive, often represents one thing with the appearance of another. Thus, a casual observer would expect that this Copper Ore merely consisted of filaments of scarlet silk: however, on examination with the help of a lens, we with certainty distinguish the contrary, and see how beautifully Nature varies her operations, and under certain circumstances accomplishes the same end with different appearances: thus, the moleculeae are forming threads more or...
