Back Porch Wisdom is a bit pretentious for a title, that's true. After all, who decides what is wisdom and what is merely the unimaginative ranting of someone who is truly self-absorbed. In this vein, I welcome you onto my back porch. It's a summer evening, and I'm going to tell you a few tales about life in general through the lens of my life experiences. Who is he, that he should be telling me his experiences your uncle might indelicately ask, leaning back in the faded vinyl rocker and unbuckling his pants to let the digestive juices work unencumbered, and daring your tale to overcome his food coma. I would respond that I am nobody of consequence, no more than anyone else, but the artful telling is the thing. In these 72 essays you will be taken to a rubbing alcohol scented doctor's office that is not exactly as Norman Rockwell pictured it; you will be transported to an oasis in the Negev desert where you will find welcome refreshment; and along the way you will meet characters like...
