LOCALIZATION BY X RAYS AND STEREOSCOPY CHAPTER I THE X-RAY TUBE Introduction. --The importance of being able to ascertain the exact position of bullets and fragments of shell lodged in the tissues of the human body needs no insistence at the time of writing, when an appalling number of wounded are being returned from the seat of war. Not only are localization methods essential while war is actually in progress, but even after hostilities have ceased many cases are bound to arise in which fragments of metal, whose extraction was not at first thought necessary or desirable, will be found to give trouble and. require to be localized. It would seem that, in this country at all events, while a great many of those occupied in X-ray practice can produce admirable photographs, they encounter considerable difficulty in localizing with sufficient exactness the position of the foreign body. It has occurred to the author, therefore, that having given many years of labour to this subject of localization, he may usefully offer to other workers in this same field some remarks on his methods and experiences. It is assumed that the reader is familiar with the ordinary X-ray outfit and its working, and therefore a dissertation on this elementary part of the subject may be omitted entirely. There are several excellent manuals describing in detail the apparatus and technique, and it would be of little use to repeat, in a condensed form, what can be found...
