Excerpt from The Life and Death of Sam: In Virginia The night was dark and dreary: twas half past ten O clock. The year was the early part of 1854. The place was a city in Virginia. When and where a small party of men had assembled together in a: remote room Of a house, not too public. About the conduct Of each there was a sort Of nervous rest lessness exhibited, which showed too plainly that conscience was at work, or that they found them selves in a novel position; perhaps about to assume relations towards their fellow-citizens, the virtue, if not the policy Of which, might be questioned. Scarce a word was breathed, and when breathed, amounted not even to a respectable whisper. Melancholy seemed hovering around those dark walls; no cheerful light issued from the dark lan tern to dispel the gloom. The men waited and watched in silence and in sadness. He will not come; so, gentlemen, I will leave you, said one Of the party. N O, N O, cried some half a dozen or more; delay but...
