Not illustrated. 1868 Excerpt: .ascertain whether the limits indicated by its special character have been observed. Lastly, as it is very desirable that those establishments which are the most completely devoted to the imparting of true technical instruction should not neglect to join to it those portions of general instruction which the pupils, according to their position, ought to possess, it is right that the masters engaged to impart general instruction, properly so called, --but those only, --should be obliged to comply with the prescriptions of the Law of 1850. It was in this spirit that the Commission adopted the following resolutions, which apply also to every description of technical instruction; to schools for children and apprentices, as well as to lectures and classes for adults. Technical instruction comprises not only the exhibition of the applications of science to industry and the practice of the processes employed in the arts,...
